The reason of this peculiar conduct on the Considerable comment was, however

The reason of this peculiar conduct on the part of the family was the presence at Trent nam of Mrs Blair, who absolutely declined to leave the duke's bedside, a determination in which she was supported by his grace's approval and even entreaties. At length the doctor's bulletins announced that the duke's illness had taken so critical a turn that it was very doubtful if he would be able to live through the following twenty-four bours, and the physicians considered it to be their duty to is form the family of the danger and to make a final appeal to the duchess to visit her hus band on what they considered his death hed. The duchess, who is a peeress in he wn right and one of the prondest grande dames of Europe gave way to their entreat ter and traveled down to Trentham, accompanied by her two sons, her daughte , Lady Alesandra, and her daughter in law, Ludy Sofford. Within a few hours after their arrival the duke took a sudden turn for the oster, and immediate danger was past. A terrible scene is then reported to have taken place between the injured wife and her children on the one side, and the intruding tady on the other. A final attempt was made to drive the latter from the house and cheeper than they can be manufactured at home. to put a stop to the scandal. The stranger, strong in the support of the duke, was, how-ever, victorious, and it was the duchess, Tentham sudd-nly the very same day. How bitterly the duchess must have felt the terrible ind goity to which she had been surjected those alone who have had the House," can realize. The queen lost no time in telegraphing to Torquay to her far orite friend "Annie," as she always calls her former misties of the robes, expression the former mistre-s of the robes, expressing the deepest sympathy and condolence at the painful and distressing shock to which she had been subjected.
